III. RESEARCH

A. RESEARCH INTERESTS

I examine the generation of authority and agency marking working and organizing in communicative capitalism, with particular attention to how sociomaterial communication practices constitute organizations. Communication, in this formulation, becomes a struggle over meaning through which political, cultural, material, and economic elements (e)merge. My interest in communicative practice translates into four relatively situated themes: (1) How the multiplicity of organizational ‘purpose’ becomes a site of contestation in organizing, (2) How and when factors typically considered ‘material’ become authoritative in organizing; (3) How individual and organizational processes of “knowing” are shaped by claims to property and promises of value; and (4) How personal identities are negotiated and accomplished in work practices. My work contributes to the development of theorizing that explains how the existence, operation, and boundaries of commercial organizations occurs in and through communication—and nowhere else.
